UN Report Claims Iran Violation of Yemen Arms Embargo

While the US has long accused Iran of having directly and heavily armed Yemen's Houthi movement, and Iran has denied any such thing, concrete proof has remained elusive. This continues to be the case, though a new UN report is likely to continue to fuel allegations.

The UN panel says they've found that Iran is in violation of the Yemen arms embargo, and that there is evidence that some of the missiles the Houthis have contain components that originated in Iran after the embargo was in place.

That said, there's no evidence the Iranian government actually provided any of this, and rather the panel is simply saying that the Iranian government's violation was failing to prevent such transfers.

Subtleties don't always make their way into the rhetoric, however, and it's likely the US and Saudis will prevent this as proof the Iranian government "sent the missiles," even though this was never even attempted to be proven by the UN panel
