Google and YouTube Suppress Russian Documentary on False Flag Terrorism

A study by Elizabeth Woodworth, a former manager of library services for the British Columbia Ministry of Health, suggests that the Google and YouTube websites, two of the world's most dominant internet portals, worked to bury the Russia Today (RT) network's Truthseeker series episode examining the history of "false flag" terrorism, and the relationship between the events of September 11, 2001 and "Operation Gladio."

Operation Gladio was a covert program backed by Western intelligence agencies from the late 1960s thru the early 1980s. During this time civilians in several European nations were terrorized in a series of deadly shootings and bombings ostensibly blamed on left wing political organizations. The state-sponsored terror was intended to influence public opinion toward such groups.

With its September 8, 2013 debut on YouTube, RT's Truthseeker episode notched 131,000 views in three days. Yet as the anniversary of 9/11 approached, YouTube curiously pulled the video from its search results, despite other popular channels like the MOXNEWS reposting it. "In both the RT and MOXNEWS cases," Woodworth observes, "the viewer statistics on YouTube suddenly flat-lined on the morning of September 11 — like a heart monitor when a patient dies. The YouTube search engine had suddenly failed to locate these videos ... The MOXNET version was also decoupled from the YouTube search engine for a period of time after September 11, but has since been restored to normal indexing."
