افغانستان آزاد _ آزاد افغانستان

AA-AA

همه سر به سر تن به کشتن دهیم 🦳 از آن به که کشور به دشمن دهیم

جو کشور نباشد تن من مباد بدین بوم و بر زنده یک تن مباد

www.afgazad.com	afgazad@gmail.com
European Languages	زبان های اروپائی

Antiwar.com

Egyptian Military's 'Neutrality' Wavers, Crackdowns Begin

By Jason Ditz

February 6, 2011

When the uprising in Egypt began last month and the military took to the streets, protesters greeted them with open arms. Even now, they continue to receive praise for their comparative neutrality, having not gone on the sort of killing sprees that some feared would be called to keep Mubarak in power.

But as the unrest continues and as the end-game negotiations begin, it seems the military's neutrality has wavered and now they have taken to arresting human rights activists, journalists, and organizers of protests, detaining all without charges.

	Mediterranean Sea Mediterranean Sea Alexandria Damletta Port Said Marsa Marsa Is. Jor.
	Canar Cattara Depression Cattara Al Jizah CAIRO SiNAJ CAIRO
UBYA	Siwah Al Payyum Al Minya Al Minya Al Minya Al Ghardagah Sharm ash Sharyah Asyut Bur
	Al Khārijah Al Khārijah
	Lake Hall'ib Nasser Triangle
20	0 100 200 km 0 100 200 mi 10 SUDAN 10

Summary and open-ended detentions are a long-standing part of the Mubarak regime's SOP, and also a major reason why there is a revolt against it now. The military's role is such detentions is growing, leading to fear it is building up to a full-on crackdown on dissent.

But the military isn't just a bottled water company (though it surely is that too), and it has long had designs on moving against a lot of these opposition factions as "threats to national security." It may well be this, more than anything else, that is driving them away from the protests and back toward Mubarak-style summary justice.